At NYU, Hodes teaches courses on race, the Civil War, and Reconstruction, and the 19th Century United States.

A Slave Escapes

Even in antebellum days thousands of American slaves freed themselves. In the border states, the Underground Railroad's help was most important, but some runaways also created their own unique escape schemes. One slave shipped himself to freedom ("Box" Brown); one married couple evolved into a slave and his owner (The Crafts), and one left in a sailor's uniform using a freedman's papers (Frederick Douglass).

President's Message

The most important part of this month's message is that our October meeting will be held on the FIRST WEDNESDAY – OCTOBER FIFTH – rather than our usual day. SAME TIME - SAME PLACE - DIFFERENT DAY.

Call in your reservation NOW to (718) 341-9811 and update your calendar, noting that the meeting will be on the FIRST Wednesday, October 5. You certainly won't want to miss our October speaker, Professor Martha Hodes (of NYU), who will discuss her award-winning book, "Mourning Lincoln," describing how the President's assassination in April 1865 was viewed by the various segments of this deeply divided nation (North and South). It was more diverse and nuanced than one would first imagine.

October, during the war, seems to be almost as heavy on politics and command changes as battles. In October 1861, the Confederacy signed treaties not with just one, but with THREE Indian tribes – the Shawnee, Seneca and Cherokee. The residents of the hill country of Western Virginia, quite dissatisfied by being controlled by the wealthy plantation owners of the Tidewater and Piedmont, vote overwhelmingly to create their own new state, to be named, unsurprisingly, West Virginia.

In October 1862, during his invasion of Kentucky (which would soon result in the Battle of Perryville), General Braxton Bragg found time to attend the inauguration of Richard Hawes as Confederate Governor of the Bluegrass state. Significant command changes included U.S. Grant assuming command of the Department of the Tennessee, Samuel Heintzleman replacing Nathaniel Banks as commander of the troops protecting Washington, and William Rosecrans replacing Don Carlos Buell as commander of the Army of the Ohio.

October 1863, saw Confederate President Jefferson Davis embark on a lengthy political speaking tour of South Carolina and Georgia (on his way to personally investigate the conflicted command situation of his Western forces). In Ohio, Peace Democrat/Copperhead Leader Clement Vallandigham is defeated in the race for Governor by War Democrat John Brough, running as a Republican. Secretary of War Edwin Stanton travels by train to Louisville to personally deliver orders to Grant appointing him Commanding General of the Union Department of the Mississippi ("The West"). At the end of the month, Jefferson Davis approves the request of Nathan Bedford Forrest for an independent command, freeing (emancipating?) him from Bragg.

A year later (October 1864), after many reverses and much disappointment, Davis names P.T.G. Beauregard as commander of the Confederate Departments of Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi. Maryland, a slave state that (barely) stayed loyal in 1861, adopts a new Constitution abolishing slavery. Nevada ("The Silver State"), site of the immense Comstock Lode from which many tons of the precious metal is being rapidly extracted, is granted many exemptions to the existing statutory requirements and allowed to become the 36th State of the Union.

If you remember nothing else from this message: MEETNG, WEDNESDAY OCTOBER FIFTH!

See You Then!

Paul Weiss

October During the Civil War

1861

3 – Issuing one of the most unfortunate edicts of the year Governor Thomas Moore (Dem. La.) embargoes cotton shipments to New Orleans, the South's greatest port. This way Europe will starve for the South's major crop and will interfere in the War Between the States. It never happens.

7 – An icon of American history, and a source of many movies, the Pony Express comes to an end after only 18 months of spectacular achievements.

24 – Don is gone and Will fills the bill. Don Carlos Buell, who suffers from McClellan-like slows, is replaced by William Rosecrans.

25 – In an uncharacteristically brusque letter to George B., President Lincoln inquires “Will you pardon me for asking what the horses of your army have done since the battle of Antietam that fatigues anything?”

1863

2 – The Atlanta Constitutionalist poses a Catch-22 problem for civilian farmers. If you take refuge further East you will be censured for leaving home; if you remain home to raise another crop in Confederate lines – as soon as the Union enemy presses forward his supplies will once more be taken by Confederate cavalry or burned up so that the federals cannot use it.

15 – The Army of Northern Virginia and the Army of the Potomac make faces at each other at Bull Run. Will this be Third Manassas? No, just some skirmishing.

12 – A well-known jurist dies. Roger Taney (pronounced Tawny) author of one of, or THE, worst decisions in Supreme Court history – you know which one – dies knowing that his beloved South and their way of life, is dying, too.

19 – The Battle of Belle Grove, Va. – What? Okay. It's also known as Cedar Creek, featuring a famous ride by a famous general.

Henry Brown was determined to escape slavery any way he could. With the help of a free black and a white storeowner, he decided to ship himself from Richmond to Philadelphia in a wooden box.

On March 23, 1849, He squeezed into a three-by-two box labeled “dry goods,” shut his eyes and prayed for salvation. It would not to be an easy trip. Brown and his crate went by wagon, steamboat, and railroad to the home of abolitionist James Miller McKim. He had little to drink and even less to eat, having only taken some biscuits with him. Once, during one leg of the trip, his box was turned upside down on a deck of a steamship where Brown sat on his head for 90 minutes. He did not think he would survive but two passengers turned the box over to use it as a seat and he was righted again.

After 27 weary hours Brown arrived safely in Philadelphia, was uncased, and liberated from his confinement. He became a minor celebrity in New England, but soon had to flee the country after the passage of the stringent 1850 Fugitive Slave Act. He later spent several years in England touring on the stage describing his escape. He eventually returned to the United States in 1875 and worked as a magician. Closing his act he would always demonstrate how he climbed into the same wooden box that had once taken him to freedom.

Frederick Augustus Washington Bailey, a 20-year-old slave, fled his job as a ship's caulker and took a train bound for the North. Disguised in a sailor's uniform, he had a free sailor's protection pass loaned to him but he feared that these important papers might be discovered to be phony in that he bore no resemblance to the man listed in the documents. When the conductor came to collect tickets Bailey almost fainted with fear but his papers were given hardly a glance.

He had even more close calls as he headed North via ferry, encountering not only an old friend on board but also a ship's captain he used to work for.

Once in New York he stayed in the home of an anti-slavery activist and then moved to New Bedford, Massachusetts.

By now you might have guessed that he changed his name to Frederick Douglass and became one of the nation's leading abolitionists. He remained a fugitive slave until 1846 when supporters helped him buy his freedom.

Robert Smalls' experience was even more extraordinary. In 1862 he worked as a trusted wheelman on the CSS Planter in Charleston, S.C. On May 13, the white crew took some unauthorized shore leave and Smalls and other slaves commandeered the ship, boarded their families at a point downstream and then steamed into Charleston harbor seeking the U.S. Navy. Smalls had donned the captain's coat and hat and he knew the ship and the harbor. Able to give the proper signals he won safe passage to Fort Sumter where he sped up to ships of the Union blockade. He ran up a white surrender flag, happily, turned over “his” ship to the awed Federal authorities.

Afterward, Smalls helped to recruit some 5,000 blacks for the Union war effort, served as the pilot and then skipper of the Planter, now a U.S. Navy vessel, and served several terms in the U.S. House of Representatives.

William and Ellen Kraft, held in bondage to two different masters, were fearful of being separated. Ellen, light-skinned, cut her hair, dressed herself in man's clothing and put bandages over her head. Her husband became her loyal man-servant. In 1848 the couple traveled by train and steamer, lodging in top-drawer hotels and hobnobbing with wealthy whites. Being illiterate she wrapped her arm in a sling making her unable to sign tickets and papers. The whole scheme almost came unraveled when a clerk refused to sell the pair a ticket without a signature. Luckily, the captain of their previous ship came by and vouched for them.

They finally arrived in Philadelphia and found shelter with abolitionists until they could continue to Boston. There, great anxiety over slave chasers led them to flee once again, but this time to England, where they wrote of their adventure.
